

Remembering The Wedding Checklist

Contributed by Rick Coelho
Tuesday, 22 May 2007

I know that when I was preparing to get married, the wedding checklist that I got with my planner was not enough, and I had to find a decent one online. This was something that saved me a lot of precious time, and also saved me from forgetting some things that I may not have remembered previously until it was too late. I may have remembered them, but I would have found myself extremely overwhelmed as the wedding approached trying to do everything that I had forgotten.

A good organized wedding checklist not only lists everything that you have to do, or at least that you might want to include, but it also gives you a good enough time frame. Some wait until it is much too late to order their bridesmaid dresses. A good wedding checklist will advise you to do it early enough for the order to come in, and to give you plenty of time for required alterations. It might tell you to do this six months before the actual wedding, where as many might wait until three months before and end up with a lot of problems. You should always assume something will go wrong, so too much time is always better than cutting it close.

You might also want to see that a good wedding checklist advises you to do things that you never thought to do previously. Did you remember to talk with your DJ or band about the music selection? Did you organize what people will do between the ceremony and reception? Do you know where everyone should stay as far as hotels? Do you have gift bags for your out of town guests? Did you give your wedding photographer a list of wanted poses? A good wedding checklist will have all of this important information, and plenty more. You can find a few and compare them to your liking.

You may think that you are having a simple wedding, and that you might not need a wedding checklist. That simply isn't true. You should find one anyway. You can whittle it down to the things you need by going through the list and marking off the things you don't want to do or don't have to worry about. Not only will a good wedding checklist help you remember everything, it will also offer you some peace of mind. That ever nagging voice in the back of your head that keeps saying you might be forgetting something will be very quiet. There's nothing like a calm bride and groom on their wedding day.

Â

Â

For the perfect wedding planner to prepare you for the special occasion visit:

<http://www.usfreeads.com/805746-cls.html>